"I have nothing more to add", says Maranda when asked about the bumpy ride he has had with the organisation since his appointment as chief justice. The SCAF must use this grave "climate" as an opportunity for review, says Maranda. International law expert and professor at Princeton University, Tom Perry, believes that President Mohamed Morsy's comments on Muslims should be taken seriously, but he adds that they should be considered in the broader context of the series of measures taken by the administration. "Although the statements may be considered as presidential, they are often reflected in the implementation of the [new] Constitution," says Perry. Perry highlights that the "closure" announced by Morsy should be considered in light of the "more hostile" atmosphere of Egypt. However, he adds that the president's remarks are a clear reference to his relationship with the Coptic Orthodox Church. For Mazhar el-Sobki, a senior political analyst, Morsy's comments should be taken in the context of Egypt's ongoing socio-economic and political problems. "There is no talking about a relation of mutual respect
